The Southern Bomb Stores – Historic England’s Brief History of the Site

The Southern Bomb Stores, or South Conventional Arms Stores were built in the 1950’s, and are defined by a single wire fence.

The Southern Bomb Stores were developed as open stores in the 1950’s when the airfield was reconstructed to accept United States’ Strategic Air Command (SAC) B-29 bombers. The total capacity of the open storage area was 60,000lbs (27, 216kg) of high explosives.

In the late 1970s, coinciding with the construction of the hardened aircraft shelters, 27 storage igloos arranged in two rows were constructed. During the mid-late 1980s the southern bomb stores were nearly doubled in size to 51 igloos, attributed to the changing role for the F-111s as ground-based missile systems and assumed the task of delivering tactical nuclear weapons.

The igloos comprise trapezoidal concrete front elevations, with a double leaf steel door and external electrical junction boxes. Internally is a single rectangular storage space with enclosed safety lighting. Externally the concrete box is earth covered. The storage buildings were unheated, and used for the storage of conventional boxed ammunition and/or inert bomb components, such as tail units.

The protected igloos provided storage for conventional free fall bombs and ammunition for M61 A 1 machine gun that might be mounted in the F-111’s weapon bays. By the end of 1977 most of the aircraft had been fitted with such guns (Gunston 1978, 81).
